

I am utterly opposed to any law that makes it a crime to develop and distribute software that has significant legitimate use. In particular, laws and regulations that prevent open source software products such as Linux from performing functions that are allowed to commercial products are completely unacceptable. Laws that restrict the distribution of source code because of the possibility that someone might modify that source code for illegal use are unacceptable.

If the FCC wishes to protect the rights of copyright holders, this should be done by going after copyright infringers, not by destroying the ability of the free software community to function.
